Course Development and Teaching Innovations

- Developed new advanced undergraduate course on “The European Union”, supported by a Jean-Monnet-Action grant from the European Commission. Revised and taught an advanced undergraduate course on “American Foreign Policy.”
- Developed and taught a new graduate seminar in “Foundations of Comparative Politics”, one of two newly required core courses in the Ph.D. program.
- Revised and taught a graduate seminar in “Comparative Public Policy,” a course that had not been taught in the department for several years. Revised and taught this course in Germany at the University of Tübingen as “Vergleichende Politikfeldanalyse.”
- Developed and taught capstone “Seminar in International and Comparative Politics” for political science majors with a concentration in international and comparative politics twice with different topics
- Developed and taught a new advanced undergraduate seminar in “European Political Parties and Elections.”
- Contributed to updating graduate program comprehensive exam reading lists for comparative politics/political institutions and for public policy.
- Attended workshops conducted by WMU’s Center for Teaching and Learning and the Office of Instructional Technology on incorporating technology in the classroom, fostering group-based learning, and using wireless technology and web-CT in teaching.
- Developed WWW-homepages, interactive sites and International and European politics resource pages for all my courses. The World Wide Web presents an excellent resource for teaching classes in comparative and international politics. It allows students to access information and conduct research for class projects using resources such as domestic and foreign on-line news services, national and international newspapers and magazines, and governmental and non-governmental databases. All my course websites can be accessed through my homepage at <http://homepages.wmich.edu/~hega>.
