DEVELOPING YOUR PROFILE IDEA

You have a person lined up for your personality-profile project. Spend a couple minutes filling out the first three questions. Now share this information with your group. In short, give them a sense of what you see as the story behind the profile.

The remaining spaces are for you to jot down ideas from the group that may help you develop your story. Give the group a chance to respond to each one of the areas, writing down the advice you find useful for your project.

For you to answer. . .
1. Who: In a few words, who is the person you will profile?

2. Why: Why are you interested in doing this story?

3. Themes: What do you think will be the focus of the story?

For the group to answer. . .
1. What interests you about the story?

2. What problems, if any, do you see in doing the story?

3. What ideas do you have for developing the story?
4. What questions should be answered in the story?

5. What sources (documents, interviews) can you think of that might help develop the story?
